

MODERN LANGUAGES GUIDED PATHWAY

With a major in a foreign language, students can offer a potential employer unique skills that are more and more in demand. Students are encouraged to complement their language study with a concentration in business, psychology, mass communication, and many other disciplines. The growth of international business and the need for employees with a global perspective serve to make graduates in foreign languages highly sought in the job market. For those who prefer to stay in an academic setting, an undergraduate concentration in a foreign language opens the way for graduate studies in teaching English to speakers of other languages, traditional graduate programs in a foreign language, law, political science, and many other graduate degrees.
