

SOCIOLOGY

"Sociology not only helped me with critical thinking and conflict resolution, it helped me understand how to work with different groups of people over an extended period of time."
- Bryant Cannon '16

The Department of Sociology, Criminology and Anthropology and at Winthrop focuses on the study of human social behavior, culture and the nature of society. Our professors believe that students learn best through experiences, rather than absorbing material through passive lectures. Sociology students learn by doing through field observations, service learning trips, internships and more. Through developing effective communication, research and problem-solving skills, our graduates continue to the workforce and graduate school with strong writing, compelling public-speaking, cross-cultural communication skills and creative research experience.

SO WHY WINTHROP?

Undergraduate Research

100 percent of majors develop their own research question, engage in research ethics training, analyze data, write up a report, and present their findings.

Student Support

Books for the first five core classes are provided to students for free, along with free tutoring in the department's work center.

Personalized Guidance

Students take a career development course freshman year, meet with faculty advisors every semester, and take Senior Seminar before graduating.

SEE FOR YOURSELF

Today's diverse global societies and technological advances have made the need for global understanding and appreciation a crucial concept for today's college student. The Department of Sociology, Criminology and Anthropology encourages students to study abroad for a semester to learn more about the diverse social, political and economic systems that structure our world. Study abroad destinations include Egypt, Costa Rica, Japan, Spain, Australia and Scotland to name a few.
