Here in the United States, we have begun more and more to ask questions that betray a logic of crisis:

- “How did we get here?”
- “What is going to happen?”
- “How can I protect myself and those closest to me?”

More than any time in recent history, and for more sectors of society, life is becoming defined by such questions. That said, the same logic of crisis has defined lived experience in much of the world for decades. Drawing from personal experience of life in Lebanon over the past few years and the pedagogical function of literature and cinema from the Middle East, this talk asks us to contemplate the feeling of crisis in its historical context.
