Non-Positional Leadership   Owens G01

Tommy Ray Davis
In our journey to develop one's leadership capabilities, we find that there is no shortage of positions that need to be filled by people who are able to do the job. Although there is an abundance of major positions and responsibilities, everyone does not get the opportunity to hold such positions or are not "qualified" to handle the rigorous prestige of these roles. But, does that make an individual unworthy of becoming an A-List leader? Does not possessing an exec position make a person incapable of making a considerable difference in an organization's overall success? In this session, we will be unpacking these common misconceptions as well as examining what it takes to be an effective leader without the title. In other words, we will be discussing the wonders of Non-Positional Leadership.

Who Are You? Leadership & Identity   Dina's Place

Gabrielle Kelly
Let's talk about the importance of knowing yourself, and how knowing yourself directly affects your leadership skills. We will address the different leadership skills and how your identity can lead you into one leadership style rather than another. Discovering your identity can also require sensitive self-evaluation. With this presentation, we will dive into how facing insecurities and comparing your old self to your new self can be toxic in finding your identity.

Helping Others Un-Mask Their Full Potential   Kinard Aud.

Justin Rose & Amore Evans

As student leaders of organizations, in order to be successful in leading an organization, it is important to utilize the strengths and capabilities of those that you lead. In doing so, you are helping those individuals to reach their full potential. In this session, we will break down the practical steps of how student leaders can help their members reach their full potential and thrive within those organizations.
